Thus, authorities must examine the social factors which influence child abuse and neglect mainly in occasions wherein families face serious difficulties such as poverty, health risks and environmental conflicts (Wolfe, 1999). Moreover, therapeutic services for vulnerable children are not often available despite the fact that every child has the right to therapeutic interventions (Rymaszewska & Philpot, 2006).

Finally, every family who receive treatment should trust specialized professionals and must consider that if relationships are where things developmental can go wrong, then relationships are where they are most likely to be put right (Howe, 2005, p.278).
