normative stability. The Chicago Area Project was an attempt at putting this strategy into practice. This program tried to reduce delinquency with two strategies. The first involved using all parts of a community, such as schools, businesses, churches, and other groups, to work together to solve community problems. The second strategy involved youth programs which would hopefully stop social disorganization, and give potentially deviant youths a path to normal, well organized society. Three programs were instituted under this second strategy. The first attempted to reduce criminal behavior, the second was aimed at general improvement of communities. This included better education, healthcare, and law enforcement. The third focused on better availability of recreational resources such as camps, which would hopefully provide constructive environments for youths. These systems of control seem practical and effective, yet a true study of their effectiveness was never actually done.
