democracy no historical meaning, no realization of any idea. It is but the product of whole series of accidents. Its future prospects are as uncertain as its past in brief. Judging from the past experiences it always ends in producing monstrous and morbid,” (183). Referring to this what the author says in this book about the forms of democracy and “the masses and the mob”, we can determine that the democracy is only a mask that is being used from rich people or people from upper class in order to rule the people from lower class and make them believe that they have a say. In this text the author also claims that the vote in a democracy helps people to protect their interests. And in this way democracy is one that includes the expression of interest by the voters and by giving people the right to vote.

As a conclusion, according to the author democracy has nothing to do with the fact that all people in society should have the same interests or same ideas, and it doesn’t mean that one should like or dislike the same things in the same exact time. And with this he explains that individuals and society are biologically linked to each other.