This essay has used explanations such as being in an emotional arousal state, or feeling as if one has to help, to explain that the theory of reciprocal altruism cannot adequately explain the behaviour exemplified in the ‘good samaritanism’ study (1969). In addition to this, two similar counter arguments was provided to show that the argument could go both ways depending on how one looks at it.