‘Rodney King’ on March 3, 1991 by officers of the Los Angeles Police Department. The atmosphere was volatile because the brutality had been videotaped by a bystander and widely broadcasted afterwards. When the four law enforcement officers charged with assault and other violations were acquitted, the 1992 Los Angeles Riots broke out. In addition similar events had been taking place previously; however the African Americans did not have a say nevertheless President Truman was trying to change this hence his report on police brutality.

The fourth point that was considered was known as the ‘To Secure These Rights’ act moreover, it was an executive act established to put an end to discrimination in the armed forces in 1948. Recognizably amongst the arm forces servicemen of the African American nature were treated unfairly. ‘in the army, black soldiers usually served in black-only units with white officers’ and evidently Truman had seen this as an aspect that needed improving he believed that African Americans were equally fighting as much as Caucasian soldiers so why should they be treated as inferiority. This had demonstrated the extent of the segregation in which they had to endure some Caucasian workers even went to the extreme extent of walking off the job due to one African American being appointed a higher role in the working field. 3,000 workers in total had walked off.

We can conclude that, Truman’s reports had been effective because they had indoctrinated awareness and knowledge of equality into some of the civilian’s minds. However, although this positive change had been taking place certain civilians that resided in the southern states still did not abide by these rules they had found sly and manipulative ways to still make the African Americans suffer.
