

“Toward the sun’s path, Hollyhock flowers turning, In the rains of summer” describe his happiness when he had his trip upon feeling being comfortable on the road. This time, Bashō met many friends and grew to enjoy the changing scenery and the seasons. Here, his poems are now on the introspective mood and more in a striking tone as he has observed the world around him:

This poem reveals how Basho’s life revolves and being cycled through time. This is a great help also to the reader, to be hopeful after every negative occurrence in life, to recognize the loneliness in one’s life, and to cherish all positive contributions that are happening in life.

Thus, Matsuo Basho’s “Four Seasons” is a poem expressing his being nature-lover and a conscious being with his experiences in life in his writing prowess.

Works Cited

- Adam, Hazard, Ed. Critical Theory Since Plato. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Pub., 1971.
Basho, Matsuo, The Four Seasons: Japanes Haiku: Mount Vernon, N.Y.: Peter Pauper Press, 1958.
Rozakis, Laurie. Literature and Composition. N.Y. ARCO, 1990.

Online Source:

Japanese Poems. July 02, 2016.

<<https://archive.org/details/fourseasons-japan00mats>>