

where it seems that nothing else could be made or done, the computer industry surpasses that without a thought.

There isn't a necessity for computers indefinitely. Generally, most people buy a computer and stay with that same system and only complementing the system here and there with upgrades or external features. Prices still remain high on many products, but the demand still ranges fair also, as consumers always like to have the most new and advanced product on the market because it supposedly does 'more'. This might not be true, it might only do the exact same things just differently, but that is the market of buyers, sellers and the war of competition.
