

On the contrary, humans have lived for a long time on this planet and there have been countless occasions which the present is shameful of. To name one; the African-American history in America. This topic is another world wide known happening that have changed the views of slavery and racial discrimination. When the Africans were forcefully abducted to the United States, the local people were not very acclaimed, thus began the racial war between the two cultures. Quickly the locals deemed the men and woman of colour to be of the less important and slavery was popularized by the haughty locals. Due to the prejudiced thinking of the previous generations, the future generation of the African Americans have to pay for the consequences as well. For instance, if the racial inequality part of history and the brutal behaviors were to be erased, the world would be a much more open minded place. Slavery ended in 1865 but acts of racial injustice still are rampant in parts of the country. This is one event in history for which people would be happy to forget.

History is such a big part of all of our lives, it is scary just to think about how if certain events in history didn't happen, a great deal of the world would be shaped differently. You and I would not be the same person that we are today. A lot of horrifying things have taken place in the past; there's the 1918 Spanish Flu where millions perished and the Black Death which plagued Europe and almost killed half of its residents. These tests of humanity have not only made us stronger as human beings today and improved our immune system but also have helped scientists give a clearer view of the medicinal field. The doctors today have learnt so much from the past that is used in practice today and not to mention mistakes were noted. We have lived on this planet for almost 200 millenniums and frankly have made mistakes since the very beginning. Learning from these faults would not have been possible if it weren't for the inhumane infections. Same goes to technological advances, the list is endless of all the marvelous things humans have come up with; the printing press, optical lenses, nuclear fission and so much more. Mankind have collected data painstakingly and to start all over again and to forget that part of history seems to be a good chance of an opportunity.

The past contains many shameful acts that we as humans get disgusted by, but this does not mean it can or should be forgotten. As humans of this part, we should accept that part of history, this part in all of us and move on with our heads held high. We should stop swimming in the pile of regret and start building more events to be proud of. In conclusion, history as a whole should not be forgotten, it should be and is made more and more each day. Every minute, an amazing mystery gets unfolded or new phenomena are made to be put into future history books. It is now our choice to make them proud events for the future generation, history is now in the eye of the beholder.
