

		with political instability comes an element of risk for organisations with global sourcing. This especially applies to the sportswear industry because companies like Nike manufacture products in many countries at risk of this such as Asia and India.		any changes to government policy, such as tax or human rights laws, can cause concerns locally and also major problems for global supply chains.	sportswear industries are usually where there is much political unrest, such as Asian countries. This can result in changes to policies within the countries which can affect the importing and exporting of products.
Legal	The improvement of employment laws in low economic developed countries	The impact of this is high as companies will need to review their methods of production to ensure they adhere to these employment laws. This applies to the sportswear sector because they are more labour, lower wages, taxes and less	Medium – The impact of this factor is long term because a lower economically developed countries begin to develop these employment laws will keep on changing, as this is done organisations will keep on having to adapt to adhere to these laws.	The impact of this factor has potential to be both favourable and adverse to the organisations affected. It can be favourable because it can help boost brand image as organisations can be seen as more ethical due to them potentially being deemed to help the labour in poor countries. In terms of Nike the improvement of employment laws has been favourable to them as it has helped improve	The improvement of employment laws will have a large effect on the sportswear industry, in both a negative and positive way, as it will increase labour costs but it provides an opportunity to create higher standards of labour.
