

had a family member in the gang joining an extension of boundaries mainly if other gangs lived nearby and formed of branches. Each gang had an area where they dominated; for instance, the Bloods were dominant in New York, so there was a need to extend and grow the gang bigger.

Another reason for the growth of gangs was the California economy; this came about in the 1950s when Los Angeles received Industrialization (Hernández,2017). The American economy was going through a shift and what was available was either high-end or low-end jobs. This pushed African Americans into being jobless because the job market could not accommodate them. The literary had no opportunities, and they felt they were above the low-level jobs. It was hard to survive, so the left option was to invent a survival way, which was the gang groups. The drug trade is another factor that led to the growth of gangs. Being that it was an income-generating idea, the introduction of crack cocaine influenced many to join. When one watches through the documentary, one feels a need to do something about the youth relating to a life you love in a comfort zone. Since the drugs, a reality check can break apart and mislead many; their consumption level is high. Therefore, the market is adequate, so even the rivalry between the Crips and Bloods was motivating.

Joining the gang group had many effects because the youth turned their lives to war and drugs; at the end of the day, if one survived, they were jailed for life, so they were movements with grave impacts on people. The youth in the gangs dropped out of school. The act of quitting school before graduation or before completion is referred to as dropping out of school. They are leaving school at a young age before completion has many impacts because one has not completed development stages. The youth gangs did not have that quality time to go on with studies because now they belonged to the world, which is notable in the movie. Another impressive effect is teen parenthood. The human body functions uniquely that there is a stage
