INTRODUCTION

NGO's are bodies which function free from the control of governmental control. These are said to be non-profit governmental bodies which work for the welfare of societies. They act as a mediator between society and government. When some issues are not solved or reached to the government

NGO's play an important role in conveying these issues and some issues which are intentionally looked down by the government then these NGO's look after those issues.

Here those people participate who want to make the world a better place for every individual who is suffering. In today's time, NGO's are playing a significant role because many times we can see that state or the governmental bodies fail to function justly. It doesn't take any financial help from the government some work on there on and some take finance from those who are willing to do good for society. These NGO's work on there on terms and principles.

In this organization, anyone can take membership and become its member. They can take membership by their own will and quit whenever they want to. But Edwin Masihi says that it isn't always free for everyone at times on demand people are enrolled. These NGO's set their own rules and eligibility terms for people to be a member. People who reach to these points get the membership and with already present members approval. That is why they are said to be voluntary functioning bodies.

NGO's have a very unique and vast past history in India. In earlier times people of India have seen to provide help and render their help to others in difficult times. People of India are believed to help each and every one in need and with their, on the wish, they provide this help. In past people who firmly followed religion were active in these services.

As they believed if they help people in need then God would reward them and wash away their sins.

They felt they achieved a sense of peace and would die peacefully if they helped one another.

Many

rulers also started the charity and serving human lives as they believed God would give them more
