

article, Julia de Raadt writes, “If you know what you’d like to major in and it falls under one of the most popular and competitive majors, like biology, computer science or business administration, there are few things you can do to ensure that you to stay true to your interests without compromising on your college success” (de Raadt). Students can choose a major which is suitable for them. By choosing the major they can consider some key factors such as future job salary, passion, and career. Even the majors which are not many popular can be found in the college. It all depends on the student, which one he or she is going to take. This one more time underlines the importance of a college education as it gives students chance to choose their favorite major to learn.

Likewise, colleges develop the responsibility of students which will stay throughout their whole life. After graduating from college students are entering into life as adult people. As known, adult people should be responsible and be serious about what life is. Being responsible is very important to achieving goals and being successful in life. Consequently, colleges are places that develop the responsibility of students. For example, when students were assigned to do homework they need to be responsible to do it at in right time which will give them better grades and make them someone who knows what to do, when, and how. In his article, suggesting how to make students love the colleges, Tony Gallagher writes about this, “One of the core social objectives of education is to prepare our children and young people to become active and responsible individuals, equipped with the competences that will enable them to have a full and productive life in society” (Gallagher 1). The author gives a clear idea about one of the important goals that colleges need to follow. Colleges are places where students are seen as adult people who can do their work independently. They are developing their responsibility which is important for the future to get into a job. Colleges can be considered as the first place for young
